WAR BONDS AND POLITICS

Let it be added at once that this was solely a byproduct of the War. The New Deal itself had little to do experience of being sworn in as with it. None of the national leaders is likely to say, "we an American citizen while serving planned it that way.' To do so would be a confession, for one thing, that various Republican spokesmen were right years ago when they insisted that in the long run the New Deal could lead nowhere else but to war. The New Dealers are hardly likely to concede that they counted on war -they protested too long and too loud that war was the furtherest thing from their minds; President Roosevelt won his third term quite largely because of an eleventh ert Reed and daughters Joy and hour speech which all American mothers took to be his promise that their sons would not fight on foreign battle-
